Excerpt: . . . 11 view a series of ultrasound images of the prostate that is taken by the doctor in which the physician has identified the prostate. With this information from the doctor, the physicist will plan the places where the radioactive seeds will be implanted into and around the prostate and estimates the radioactive dose to be delivered to the prostate. This plan is always confirmed or potentially revised by the doctor. Second, not long after the doctor is to perform the implant, the physicist will check the activity level of a sample of seeds to be im-planted and deliver those seeds to the doctor in the operating room ( OR ). The third thing a physicist does takes place after the implant. At the Pennsylvania VA Medical Center the doctor would order a CT scan of the patients prostate the day after the implant. On this CT scan the physicist would identify the location of the implanted seeds, using a dedicated computer program for this purpose. Once this was done, the doctor would locate the prostate on the CT scan and draw it in. This would allow the computer program to generate what we call a dose volume histogram, which is essentially a graph showing how much of the prostate received how much of the prescription dose, as well as different dose parameters. This infor-mation is often referred to as post-implant dosimetry. Post-implant dosimetry is performed so that the doctor might evaluate the implant as part of his overall assessment of his ongo-ing treatment plan for the patient. I recognize that the...
